Areas of Work: Provides technological services and manufacturing to customer specifications; manufactures electrical materials; flexible circuitry, electronic connectors and terminals.

Divisions:

Electronic Materials/Engineered Products

Flexible electronic materials are the "raw materials" from which flexible circuits are made. For the most part, they are laminates of metallic foils - commonly copper - bonded to a variety of dielectric substrates as well as coverlay materials to insulate the complete circuit. Both the electronic materials and coverlays are produced by Sheldahl in industrial size rolls, ready for conversion into flexible circuitry components.

Engineered products include aerostats for telecommunications, a "padeye" system for transloading ships at sea, helicopter blade liners, special fabrications, tambour covers, splicing tapes, coated products, tapes and laminated, and vacuum metalized materials.

Flexible Circuits/Membrane Switches

Flexible circuits are preassembled "interconnect" products - generally free of defects and adaptable to a constantly growing number of applications. Because they are indeed flexible, they can conform to almost any configuration on multiple planes, while retaining their electrical/electronic function. Typical applications for flex circuits include telephones and communication switching equipment, computer memory storage systems, cameras, hand-held-calculators, automobiles and medical instrumentation.

Sheldahl's FLEXSWITCH membrane switches make up the company's newest product line - for the membrane switch keyboard market. In composition, the FLEXSWITCH keyboard consists of a three-layer polyester film sandwich bonded together by means of a special Sheldahl proprietary adhesive. A flexible circuit, an integral part of the membrane switch, provides interconnection. Typical applications for FLEXSWITCH include electronic educational devices, control panels for washers and dryers, medical instrumentation control panels, automotive electronics and plain paper copiers.

Areas of Work: The Corporation designs and manufactures digital radiography image processing systems which utilize digital images as opposed to the conventional film used in radiology. The system processor is a computer controlled image-processing system with real-time image manipulation hardware, digital data storage via magnetic disc drives, an analog video disc recorder and interface electronics for connection to X-Ray fluoroscopy systems. ADAC is also involved in the design and manufacture of nuclear medicine image processing systems which accept images from the scintillation cameras used in nuclear medicine, convert them to digital form and store them for further analysis.

Other products include radiation therapy planning systems which develop precise radiation dosimetry plans for individual cancer patients using display terminals; X-Ray products, and research and development.
